Excerpt from The Disruption of the United States: Or the Origin of the Second Civil War My Dear Nephew: You express astonishment in the last letter I received from you at reading in your History of America, that the Disruption of the United States Republic should have taken place so short a time after the celebration of their Centennial Anniversary. The reason you assign as an excuse for your surprise does credit to your sagacity, and confirms me in the hope that you may yet live to be an honor to the Republic of New Zealand, in which you live, where happier conditions may spare you those miseries which we Americans, with common ancestors of British origin, have had to endure. You say that it might have been supposed that the eulogies, the patriotic memories, which such a celebration necessarily must have inspired, would seem to have had little effect if they did not interpose to such a result a barrier which ought to have been insuperable. It seems to me, that this must be the exclamation of our posterity, when we who were actors in the great tragedies of 1877 have passed away, when we are no longer here to bear our personal testimony to the corruption and the venality, the entire disregard of all written forms of law which so early as its one hundredth anniversary sapped the entire foundations of the American Republic, and plunged it into irretrievable ruin.
