Neoplastic epithelia are not TABLE 2 Effects upon the flow of gastric juice and its acidity which follow the injection of extracts from pathological human thyroids I generally believed to produce any secretion and the above experimental findings with thyroid adenomata seem to confirm this belief. The lack of response from extracts of thyroids which showed active hyperplasia at least indicates so great a change in the quality of the product as to prevent the fulfillment of its usual function. We next tested the effects upon the stomach of the subcutaneous injection of atropin, nicotine, commercial adrenalin and extracts of the adrenal and pituitary glands. In previous experiments (1) as remarked before, we had ascertained that the adrenal and pituitary were the only organs which seemed capable of inhibiting the gastric secretion. Nicotine was accidentally noted to have this effect and although it is understood to act upon some intermediate nervous mechanism it was employed as a comparison with atropin, which paralyzes the terminal filaments of the vagus. The records given above are a fair average of a large number of tests. It is well known that the secretory activity of the stomach is very largely controlled by the vagi, stimulation of which increases the flow, and by the sympathetic which inhibits. It can be noted that a moderate dose of atropin very quickly stops the gastric secretion, presumably by paralysis of the...
